Four Fables of Forgiveness

Fables, or myths, abound in discussions about forgiving others. Below are four of the more common fables involving forgiveness.

To forgive is to forget. There is a sense in which this is false, and there is a sense in which this is true, and the difference lies in one's definition of "forget." If we define "forget" as the act of putting the offense completely out of our minds and erasing it from our memory, then we've got a problem. It is a psychological impossibility. As soon as we make up our minds to forget something, it is the one thing that will linger at the forefront of our minds. We all forget things, but we do it unintentionally over the course of time. Life and experience and old age work to erase certain things from our memory, but that is rarely, if ever, the case with sins committed against us and the wounds we have suffered.

However, as to the truth of this statement, consider the words of Henry Ward Beecher, "I can forgive, but I cannot forget, is only another way of saying, I will not forgive. Forgiveness ought to be like a cancelled note—torn in two, and burned up, so that it never can be shown against one." Forgiveness does involve the release of resentment and the resolve not to use the offense against the offender or bring it back up before him/her (1 Cor. 13:5; Eph. 5:26, 31-32). It is in that sense that we can speak of forgiveness as forgetting.

To forgive is to deny the pain. In most cases, the only way we can stop hurting is to stop feeling, and the only way we can stop feeling is to die emotionally. But, as humans, we are not passionless robots. This may be one of the primary reasons people are reluctant to forgive. They know they are struggling to stop feeling the sting of the sin against them, and they don't want to be insincere by saying they forgive when deep down inside they don't feel as if they have. The pain caused by another's sin or wrongdoing may linger for some time, but forgiveness is possible without denying the pain or acting like what the offender did had no effect on us. Indeed, forgiving another often involves letting the offender know the pain that his/her offense caused.

To forgive is to refuse justice. On March 22, 2006, Mary Winkler murdered her husband, Matthew Winkler. In the aftermath, Dan and Diane Winkler, Matthew's parents, forgave Mary. However, in forgiving her, that did not mean that they were refusing justice for her action. They attended her trial in view of seeing justice done for Matthew's death. Sin has its consequences, and some sins meet with rather severe consequences in this life. God undoubtedly forgave David for his adultery and murder, but even God's forgiveness in this situation did not nullify the punishment that David received (cf. 1 Sam. 12). Despite what some folks have concluded in view of interpersonal relationships, forgiveness and justice are not mutually exclusive. When somebody, for instance, commits a crime against us, to seek justice, even as we work to forgive him/her, is entirely acceptable, but in our pursuit of justice, we must refuse to become vigilantes (Rom. 12:19—13:5).

To forgive is to trust. Forgiveness is a gift, but trust is earned. Forgiveness and trust are not the same thing. An offender may hurt us again. That is his/her decision. In those instances when trust is lost, it is perfectly legitimate to set boundaries on our relationship with him/her. The fact that we establish rules to govern how and to what extent we interact with this person in the future does not mean we have failed to truly forgive this individual. The offender may get upset when we set certain parameters on the relationship to prevent him/her from doing further harm. They may even say, "How dare you? This just proves that you didn't mean it when you said you forgave me." Let's refuse to be manipulated in this way. Forgiving an offender doesn't mean that our trust in the offender is automatically restored. In fact, a loss of trust is a consequence of the offender's sin or wrongdoing that the offender must face.

Most of you have probably heard the illustration before where a tube of toothpaste is used to teach us to be careful with our words. It goes like this: you take a tube of toothpaste, squeeze it out onto a plate, and then attempt to put the toothpaste back into the tube. Try as you might, it simply can't be done! It just creates even more of a mess! At least the mess smells ok, but it is a mess, nonetheless.

The moral of this illustration is that we must be careful with the words we use because once we say them, we can't take them back. This is so true. The Bible is clear about the dangers of the tongue, and in no place is that clearer than in James 3:2-12. There we find the half-brother of Jesus going into detail about how dangerous the tongue is. It can sway our entire being. It can stain our whole body. It can set fires. It cannot be tamed. Try as we might, we will never be able to completely tame our tongues! This certainly doesn't mean that we shouldn't try our best, but we will never be perfect in our speech.

So, what do we do when we've said something that we shouldn't have? Obviously, as the aforementioned illustration points out, we can't take the words back. Once the toothpaste is on the plate, the only thing there is to do is deal with the mess.

When you make a mess with your words, the first thing to do is to acknowledge it. Be specific. Go to the person/people that you have offended and tell them what you said (even though they already know). Acknowledge that it was wrong and that you regret it. Being specific in our apologies when it comes to sins of the tongue makes it easier for us to keep from saying the same things again. Additionally, it helps those that we have offended to know that we are serious about wanting forgiveness.

Additionally, we should assume that our words have hurt the other party. Rather than offering up an "apology" laced with something like "if it offended you, I'm sorry," just say you're sorry. A conditional apology is really no apology at all.

We are going to say things that we shouldn't say. James didn't give us a way around that. So, when we do mess up with our tongues, owning up to it will help us keep from doing the same thing again.

Until next time...Jeremy
